ADMINISTRATIVE NOTE

Wave Hill Station is located approximately 600 kilometres south of Darwin in the Northern Territory. Vestey's, a pastoral company owned by Baron Vestey, an English baronet, purchased the station in 1914. Along with other pastoralists, Vestey's was able to use the local Aboriginal people, who were landless through the creation of the station, as extremely cheap labour. Working and living conditions were appalling; a Northern Territory government inquiry held in the 1930s said, "It was obvious that [Vestey's] had been ... quite ruthless in denying their Aboriginal labour proper access to basic human rights." The wages of Aboriginal stockmen were set by the Welfare Ordinance and Wards Employment Ordinance, at a rate far lower than the Awards controlling the wages and conditions of white workers. On many stations, including Wave Hill, the wages paid were significantly lower again than the rate set by the Ordinances and were often retained by station management as payment for rations, clothing etc. Station management also retained welfare payments such as pensions and child endowment, through an arrangement whereby the Commonwealth Welfare Department paid these remittances to recognised 'institutions' (such as pastoral stations) rather than to individual Aboriginal people.

In 1964, the Social Welfare Ordinance replaced the Welfare Ordinance; the new Ordinance allowed the payment of award wages to Aborigines. The North Australian Workers Union applied to the Conciliation and Arbitration Commission to vary the Cattle Station Industry (Northern Territory) Award, to include Aboriginal workers. In 1965 the Commission ruled in favour of equal wages for male Aboriginal workers, then in March 1966 allowed a delay in implementation until December 1968. This led to Aboriginal workers on a number of stations striking or walking off the station, beginning with Newcastle Waters.
In August 1966, 200 Aboriginal stockmen, house servants and their families, led by Vincent Lingiari, Gurindji elder and spokesman, walked off Wave Hill in protest at working conditions and the delay in achieving equal pay. In 1967 they established camp at Wattie Creek (Daguragu) and decided to press for return of their land. On 16 August 1975, Prime Minister Gough Whitlam transferred leasehold title to the Gurindji.

The Gurindji were supported by a number of organisations, including unions in the southern states. Frank Hardy, member of the Communist Party and author of The Unlucky Australians, about the walk off, played a central role in organising this support. The Northern Territory Council for Aboriginal Rights (NTCAR), the Federal Council for Aboriginal Advancement (FCAA), which became the Federal Council for the Advancement of Aborigines and Torres Strait Islanders (FCAATSI), and Abschol were among these organisations, which organised collaboratively and independently in the campaigns to support the Gurindji. These papers provide evidence of the communications between these organisations on the topic of support for the Wave Hill walk off.

The Northern Territory Council for Aboriginal Rights (NTCAR) formed in 1961, with a requirement that 75% of the executive be Aboriginal. It affiliated with FCAA in 1962. The NTCAR campaigned against discrimination wherever it was able, e.g., for the right to be served alcohol or to sit anywhere in a picture theatre; it assisted Aboriginal employees to obtain award wages in the Northern Territory railways and on the Darwin wharf. A facsimile of the NTCAR program can be found here: http://indigenousrights.net.au/__data/assets/image/0011/398450/i999_1.jpg. From 1966, NTCAR's focus was the Gurindji walk off, providing material support – food, clothing, vehicles and equipment – and publicity for the Gurindji.

In February 1958, Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal activists from all mainland states formed the Federal Council for Aboriginal Advancement (FCAA), a national pressure group. Its goal was the achievement of 'equal citizens' rights' for Aboriginal Australians. Over the next fifteen years it campaigned for constitutional change, equal wages, access to social service benefits, and rights to land. In 1964 it recognised Torres Strait Islanders as a distinct people and become the Federal Council for the Advancement of Aborigines and Torres Strait Islanders, or FCAATSI. FCAATSI supported the Gurindji at Wave Hill through fundraising, material support and publicity. The bulk of the papers in this collection document that support.

The original aim of Abschol, a committee of the National Union of Students established in the 1950s, was to support university scholarships for Aboriginal students. Through the 1960s, it broadened its concerns, affiliating with FCAATSI and becoming a political pressure group concerned particularly about land rights. Abschol members visited Wattie Creek, helping erect buildings and organising material support. Some of that activity is documented in these papers.

Stan Smith, and his wife Mamie Smith, lived in Darwin for some of the period covered by these papers. They also lived in Mount Morgan in Queensland and visited parts of south eastern Australia. He and Mamie were members of FCAA/FCAATSI, Stan serving on the executive and as Publications Convenor at various times. These papers document their involvement in FCAA/FCAATSI’s support for the Gurindji, including organisational and personal relationships with NTCAR, Abschol and the Gurindji. Stan was a journalist and wrote articles for publication as part of his support for the Wave Hill walk off. The papers in this collection were compiled by Stan Smith.
