WATCH

THAT

TEMPERATURE

RISE

Here is a special and most important message for mothers of young babies.

While we are enjoying the warmth of summer we tend to forget that there may be a danger of serious heat effects to our babies. Their bodies are unable to adapt quickly to heat conditions like those of older children and adults.

Fortunately it's quite simple to protect them when the forecast warns us of hot weather to come by a few commonsense measures. Points to keep in mind for example are:

- Baby should only wear a minimum of clothing. A cotton singlet and napkin. In the case of extremely hot weather, remove these and place a napkin under the buttocks.

- It's most important that the baby is kept supplied with plenty of liquids. Not only milk but also cool boiled water and diluted orange drinks. These should be offered regularly throughout the day.

- Place baby in the coolest position either inside or outside the house BUT NOT IN THE SUN.

- Sponge or bath the baby frequently in cool water. Should he seem irritable, hot to touch, and freely perspiring, call your doctor. Should hospital treatment be required there is no need for alarm as babies suffering from heat exhaustion respond very quickly to treatment.

We also tend to forget that elderly folk are also very susceptible to heat effects, usually heat exhaustion, because their circulation may not respond briskly enough to hot conditions. Heat exhaustion is quite unlike heatstroke or sunstroke; the patient's temperature stays normal or low and he becomes pale and clammy with a weak, rapid pulse and severe headache is usual. You should call the doctor if this happens to an elderly member of the family and meantime keep him warm and quiet and give him plentiful water to drink, preferably with half to one teaspoonful of salt to the pint added. Since prevention is better than cure, encourage the old folk to dress in light loose clothing and to avoid strenuous activity in the hot parts of the day.
